Message

from the Chester County
Agricultural Development Council

The Chester County Board of Commissioners and the Agricultural Development Council (Ag Council) are pleased to share the inspiring stories of resilience and innovation from Chester County farmers in the pages that follow.

The past year has been a time of extreme trials and tribulations for people and industries around the world, Chester County agriculture is no exception. But out of that adversity has come heartwarming examples of farmers and agriculture service professionals rising up to overcome the challenges they and their industry have faced with tremendous displays of courage, generosity and entrepreneurship.

This year's guide introduces you to some of the next generation of Chester County farmers including our Farmers of the Year, mushroom growers Sonya Beltran and her family; and Liz Hopkins, an unlikely farmer from the suburbs who left a public safety career for agriculture.

You'll also get to learn about Willistown Conservation Trust's Rushton Farm, a farm model that is changing the way people think about farming's impact on the environment and developing a whole new crop of environmental ambassadors.

As the days grow longer and brighter, so do the aspirations and hopes of agricultural entrepreneurs creating opportunities within Chester County's storied agricultural heritage. The Hemp Alternative team are taking a historically significant crop in exciting new directions. The owners of Thornbury Farm Market and CSA and Warwick Furnace Farm are bringing new life—and new visitors—to two properties steeped in our nation's history.

Journey along with us on these pages and get to know your farming neighbors and all the delicious, locally grown products they have to share. This is the perfect time of year to discover some fresh, regional flavors and make new friends!

Farmers of the Year:

Sonya Beltran and the Beltran family
First Generation Farms &
Masda Mushrooms

Each year the Chester County Board of Commissioners and the Ag Council select a Farmer(s) of the Year. For more information about our ag awards program and past winners, visit www.chescofarming.org.

“There aren’t a lot of women mushroom growers, but I didn’t do this to be the next female Latina grower,” says Farmer of the Year, Sonya Beltran of First Generation Farms and Masda Mushrooms. “I am honored to do this work and expand my parents’ dream.”

Sonya was initially nominated on her own for the award by the American Mushroom Institute for excellence as a mushroom grower and industry advocate, but when she was told about the award, she insisted that her family also be recognized. “I wouldn’t be where I am today without my parents’ hard work and sacrifice,” she says.

The Beltran family grows fresh white and cremini mushrooms for restaurant and food service customers up and down the East Coast. From humble beginnings, the Beltran’s farm now encompasses over 50 growing rooms with an average production of around 11 million pounds of fresh mushrooms a year.

Chester County Commissioners Marian Moskowitz, Josh Maxwell and Michelle Kichline, along with representatives from the Chester County Ag Council and American Mushroom Institute, presented the award to Sonya and her family at their farm in Avondale in October.

“It was my pleasure to recognize Sonya and her family as the county’s 2020 Farmers of the Year,” says Chester County Ag Council Chairman Chris Alonzo. “Sonya brings so much energy and entrepreneurial talent to her family’s business and the wider mushroom industry as well.”

Sonya’s parents, Daniel and Maria Beltran, came to Chester County from Jalisco, Mexico in 1980. Daniel worked his way up through every job in the mushroom industry. After many years of hard work and on-the-job education, he was able to buy his own mushroom houses and start First Generation Farms (retail side of the business) and Masda Mushrooms (growing side of the business).

“My dad doesn’t consider himself an expert but he has done every job from harvester, compost layer, water man and now owner in his 40 years in the industry,” says Sonya.

The name “First Generation” speaks for itself but the name “Masda Farms” is also tied to the Beltran family. Masda is an amalgam of the family’s first names. “M” is for Maria; “A” is for Alberto, Daniel and Maria’s son, who is studying mechanical engineering at Purdue; “S” is for Sonya; “D” is for Daniel; and the last “A” stands for Avril, their teenage daughter.

Nowadays, Sonya works alongside her father as they navigate the fluctuating market for fresh mushrooms and look for ways to increase efficiency while maintaining strict quality standards.

“Though this industry requires you to work untraditional hours, we have tried to maintain our focus on the quality of our product at all times,” she says.

Sonya officially joined the business eight years ago after receiving her BA in retail management and MA in organizational leadership. She is currently the Director of Operations, overseeing worker safety, product marketing and sales. She has a strong affinity for safety oversight which has served her well throughout the pandemic.

“Food and worker safety involves understanding and coordinating multiple kinds of regulations. I can walk through a growing room and pinpoint what needs to be fixed right away,” says Sonya.

Although COVID-19 has been extremely challenging for the food service supply chain, Sonya says that worker safety is always their number one priority. To that end, she partnered with LCH Community Health and Human Services, a nonprofit health center that provides care to southern Chester County, to offer voluntary onsite testing, and has worked with employees when they needed flexible schedules due to childcare disruption.

“Without all of our hardworking employees and the people who have supported us, we would not be here,” Sonya says.

Rachel Roberts, the Executive Director of the American Mushroom Institute says, “Sonya exemplifies the very best of the Pennsylvania mushroom farming community. Her love and commitment to her family farm is coupled with her innovative spirit and desire to learn in order to continue her family’s legacy.”

Sonya doesn’t hesitate when asked what she would recommend to youth interested in pursuing careers in agriculture: “I would recommend persistence and being able to adapt. You need to be able to put aside the plan you made and address the problem. No day is the same.”

“Without all of our hardworking employees and the people who have supported us, we would not be here.”

Those characteristics of flexibility and innovation have also been valuable assets in her work as a mushroom industry advocate.

Sonya currently serves as Chairperson of the Mushroom Council, the national mushroom trade promotion group geared towards expanding the consumer market for fresh mushrooms.

“I’m excited about promoting “The Blend,” a cooking technique that combines chopped mushrooms with ground meat to make recipes more delicious, nutritious and sustainable,” says Sonya. “Mushrooms add Vitamin D, which is critical for healthy immune systems, and they are very cost-friendly for a pandemic budget.”

With growers like Sonya and her family leading the way, Chester County’s top agricultural industry is in good hands now and in the future.

Hemp: A New Frontier for a Colonial Crop

Although hemp played a critical role in the formation of the United States, growing it was banned for nearly a century due to misplaced fears over its close association with the marijuana plant. However, recent changes to national and state legislation have opened opportunities for enterprising growers willing to navigate a new and occasionally fraught market.

In colonial times, hemp was used to produce everything from the paper on which the Declaration of Independence was written to the fabric covers for the Conestoga wagons that traveled across the country.

Lawmakers banned the production of hemp and marijuana during the Prohibition Era in the 1930s due to concerns over a single cannabinoid, THC (tetrahydrocannabinol), the psychoactive ingredient associated with feelings of euphoria found in high levels in marijuana. However, industrial hemp contains 100 times less THC than its potent cousin, lacking the narcotic effects.

The 2018 Farm Bill recognized this difference and removed industrial hemp from regulation under the Controlled Substances Act, creating opportunity for local entrepreneurs like Hemp-Alternative CEO Cynthia Petrone-Hudock.

One of 30 permitted growers in Chester County, Petrone-Hudock and her team believe hemp is poised to return to prominence as a source of environmentally friendly products, food and cannabinoid based alternative medicine (CBD for instance, another cannabinoid from the hemp plant being studied for use to treat pain, epilepsy and inflammatory disorders).

Petrone-Hudock wasn't always involved in agriculture. She began her career in banking, but taking care of her father through his long illness inspired her to go a different path.

"I saw our broken healthcare system and I wanted to make a difference," she says, so she transitioned into healthcare IT.

Petrone-Hudock then realized there was an opportunity for companies looking to provide alternative medicine to a growing geriatric population and those managing chronic pain illnesses without the unpleasant side effects associated with commonly prescribed painkillers like opioids.

Partnering with 4th generation crop farmer Jamie Hicks of Hicks Brothers Farming in Kennett Square helped make her vision a reality. Hicks has many years of experience growing traditional crops like corn, soybeans, wheat and hay, but was already looking into hemp production when approached by Petrone-Hudock.

"I'm drawn to the challenge of developing a market for a new crop," he says.

Hicks brought in specialty crop grower Juan Medina to the Hemp-Alternative team to help manage the incredibly specific way hemp needs to be grown and harvested for high cannabinoid productivity while meeting stringent government regulation.

After only three years of operation, the group now grows hemp for both cannabinoids and fiber in multiple counties in Pennsylvania and Maryland. They also provide hemp industry expertise, seed sourcing and cultivation services for the larger farming community.

“I saw our broken healthcare system and I wanted to make a difference.”

Regional research and educational institutions have started to take note. Hemp-Alternative is actively partnering with Stroud Water Research Center in Avondale. They will measure soil characteristics, plant growth and nutrient content, and rainwater infiltration to better understand how the widespread adoption of this crop may affect our landscapes, particularly the impact or benefit for water quality and quantity in our freshwater ecosystems that are an integral part of the agricultural landscape.

Hemp-Alternative is also working with Jefferson University, Kanbar College of Design, Engineering & Commerce on sustainable product development, particularly looking into a line of sustainable garden products, a good fit for a company located outside of Philadelphia, “America’s Garden Capital.”

There are even plans with a local mill in the works to create a high energy, high protein snack with a charitable mission to help food-insecure communities.

Despite all these promising opportunities, growing hemp is not without significant risk. Financial return can be slow as growing and processing a novel crop takes specialized equipment, know-how and ongoing, complicated testing. The initial investment can be high.

Petrone-Hudock cautions new growers to invest their time and money slowly—and do their homework.

“The lack of education is the crux of most of the risk,” she says. “We are tackling an emerging industry that is a regulatory hotbed, rules and regulations are evolving and we need to help lawmakers and the public understand what hemp is and isn’t.”

There are also ongoing banking challenges. Financial institutions were only allowed to start offering financial services to hemp growing operations in 2018 thanks to the Farm Bill and many are still wary to get involved in this new market.

But Petrone-Hudock sees reason for optimism regarding this rising tide industry. “There is a swell of momentum, regulators and physicians are feeling the pressure from patients to learn more about the value of cannabinoids to your health and the fiber plant to our earth” says Petrone-Hudock. “With more education and evidence-based research, the hemp movement may actually turn out to be a hemp revolution. That’s why I sit on the PA hemp steering committee.”

Celebrating the Past, Farming for the Future

Visitors come to Chester County for many reasons, but arguably the region's historic significance and vibrant farming community are two of the biggest reasons.

Thornbury Farm (Westtown Twp.)

In many cases, history and agriculture beautifully intersect to create unique visitor experiences steeped in Chester County charm.

History is Randell Spackman's passion. As the third generation owner of 300-year-old Thornbury Farm and president of the Chaddsford Historical Society, he knows he is simply the current owner in a long line of stewards of a farm whose story includes being the site of the final troop engagement of the Battle of Brandywine on September 11, 1777.

In addition to hosting troop activity, Thornbury Farm's barn and spring house were used to hold prisoners and the main house was used as a hospital. Many paranormal enthusiasts have reported that spirits still haunt on the property.

Other notable Thornbury history includes the fact that the "main house" was the first quarried home in Pennsylvania and was built using the property's own quarry. It was later used as Chester County's first public library. In addition, the main house and a second farm house built in 1812 were used as stops on the Underground Railroad.

Although he loves the past, Spackman runs the farm with an eye to the future. He recognizes how important a farm like this is to upcoming generations: "Thornbury isn't only a place to learn where our country comes from, it's where we can bring our kids to show them where our food comes from."

Spackman says his biggest challenge is trying to celebrate Thornbury's history while keeping it a working farm. Previously, much of the land was used for crop production, but Spackman started a CSA (Community Supported Agriculture) operation in 2009 as a way to engage the community more closely through offering a range of produce.

Over the years, he and his family have developed other creative ways to captivate guests with a blend of farm experiences. Visitors can explore the farm through special tours and visits to the on-farm store for fresh produce. They also hold weddings, corporate retreats and live music events with accompanying food trucks.

"Hosting events on the farm introduces people to Chester County's history, and when event caterers use Thornbury-grown vegetables and fruit, they enjoy the flavor of our region," says Spackman.

Spackman's favorite part of owning a historic farm is when people visit for the first time: "I love when people get to see what we are doing to preserve our farm's history and then get to taste the food we grow here. Their eyes open up with amazement."

Warwick Furnace Farm (Warwick Twp.)

Warwick Furnace Farm’s many historic structures, including stone buildings and barns dating back to the 18th and 19th centuries, had stood unoccupied for decades when the Rosen family came across the property listing in 2016. The early 19th Century dairy barn - one of the largest in Chester County - was being considered for demolition.

“It was a captivating place, much like the Secret Garden overgrown and a bit neglected, but there was something special here,” says Dolly Rosen, matriarch of the family.

The farm is adjacent to the historic Warwick Furnace, established in 1738 by Anna Nutt, who oversaw its completion and its operations after her husband died. The furnace furnished armaments for George Washington, produced the Franklin stove and manufactured the components for the first metal-clad ship during the Civil War. In the mid-20th Century, the farm was an award winning dairy.

Warwick Furnace Farm is now home to Dolly and Ed Rosen and their four grown daughters (Claire, Lillie, Charlotte and Camille), a pandemic arrangement that has proven beneficial to their budding lavender business.

“We love that this property was established by a woman, it’s so fitting for our family,” laughs Lillie.

The Rosens currently grow several varieties of Certified Naturally Grown lavender, which they distill into essential oils onsite and process into a line of home and beauty products. The restored buildings set the tone for their business’s aesthetic, as well as housing their farming operations and on-farm store.

“We strive to be environmentally thoughtful in our farming, production and packaging choices, taking inspiration from the past” says Lillie.

They also welcome visitors for pick-your-own lavender harvests starting in June in fields overlooking the preserved French Creek valley.

Starting their farm business has been a labor of love for the entire family, however, the preservation of the farm’s historic structures continues to be a significant undertaking. They encourage municipalities to appreciate how powerful a tool adaptive reuse can be for long term preservation of historic properties.

“We have received wonderful support from our neighbors as they’ve seen the farm come back to life,” says Claire. “We are very lucky to be a part of the story being told here.”

An Unlikely Farmer:

Liz Hopkins of Honeymoon Farm & Medina Mushrooms

Growing up in a suburban neighborhood in Berwyn, no one in Liz Hopkins' family ever imagined that she would grow up to be a farmer. But Hopkins thrives on challenges and breaking the mold.

"I've always been an independent person," she laughs. "My parents can vouch for the pains I've caused them."

Hopkins puts those qualities to work every day as she and her husband Gary grow their Oxford farm businesses: Honeymoon Farm and Medina Mushrooms. They currently sell nine varieties of mushrooms including familiar white button mushrooms and exotic varieties like Lion's Mane and Maitake, and pastured poultry at farmers markets in Chester County, Maryland and Delaware.

"Our dining room is our marketing headquarters. We have a commercial refrigerator for mushrooms and shelves for market bags and equipment. We haven't had dinner in there in months," says Hopkins.

Hopkins' journey from non-farming suburbanite to beginning farmer was anything but direct.

Inspired to help the public, she initially pursued a career in public safety administration and trained as an EMT and firefighter. Although she is still passionate about public safety, she always felt pulled towards agriculture.

Hopkins, first meaningful contact with food production happened when she befriended culinary students in college.

"Food was my introduction to the idea that good ingredients come from good farms," she says.

Through her friends' studies, she got to see how butchers break down a whole animal into parts and joined them as they visited different kinds of restaurants in their college town.

Another pivotal influence in her farming journey came when she met her now-husband, Gary Hopkins, a fourth generation mushroom farmer.

"Our first date was an evening farm check at his family's mushroom farm," she recalls.

After her husband's family took some steps into mushroom direct retail sales, Liz officially established Medina Mushrooms in 2016, bringing the family mushroom business more permanently to retail markets.

While her husband, his father and other family members continue to focus on production for their wholesale and contracted accounts, she enjoys bringing mushrooms to the public at farmers markets.

“I love sharing our farm story with people and talking about all of the new ingredients and recipes they are trying at home,” she says.

Hopkins was initially worried that her parents might not approve of her farming aspirations after training so long for public safety, but her worries were unfounded.

“They have seen the struggles and the successes as we have built our farm business and have always supported me,” she says.

Although their fresh, exotic mushrooms are often what draw customers, poultry is Hopkin’s true passion.

Instead of taking a traditional honeymoon after they got married, the couple decided to invest the money in expanding their farm to include pastured heirloom and conventional breed chickens and turkeys. They also wanted a new farm name to encompass future products they plan to sell.

“We had been talking about what trips we wanted to take, but that money would have equaled a lot of chickens and infrastructure. Gary said he’d much rather spend that money on our forever honeymoon~ our farm.”

“Food was my introduction to the idea that good ingredients come from good farms.”

But starting a farm hasn’t been as simple as picking a great farm name and sacrificing a honeymoon.

Like many new and beginning farmers, Liz and Gary Hopkins are working towards either buying the farm they currently lease or looking for an affordable property where they can expand their operations to include more types of poultry and adding a processing facility.

With the pandemic highlighting the importance of a strong, local meat supply and the shortage of nearby meat processing facilities, they are pursuing training and certification to build a USDA- inspected poultry processing facility designed to support their farm and other farms in the region.

“I see real opportunity to strengthen our local food systems and farming communities,” says Hopkins. “But we need to get the property first.”

As Hopkins’ parents can attest, this new and beginning farmer thrives on a good challenge.

Willistown Conservation Trust's Rushton Farm

"We want people to truly understand the value of conserving land for agriculture," says Fred de Long, the Director of Willistown Conservation Trust's Rushton Farm Program.

Willistown Conservation Trust (WCT) is a non-profit land trust working to protect open land in the 28,000 acres surrounding Willistown, Pa. Their holistic approach to conservation explores the connections among land, birds, habitat, farm and water.

It's also home to Rushton Farm, a diverse, six acre produce operation that yields 30,000 pounds of food a year for the farm's CSA (community supported agriculture) program members and for two local food cupboards.

How did this productive farm enterprise come to be such an integral part of a land trust devoted to environmental stewardship and conservation?

In 2007, a conversation that had been brewing among Willistown staff and board members about honoring the land's rich agricultural history came to a head. The Trust would pilot a diverse, environmentally sensitive farm next to Rushton Woods Preserve to show that conserved land can be used for productive farming, as it had been for centuries prior.

"It's all about agro-ecology, how agriculture and the ecosystem work together."

It was the Trust's first project to use protected land for a purpose beyond its recreational value and benefit to wildlife, but it took a lot of convincing to get everyone on board.

De Long remembers having to work with the WCT board and staff to convince everyone that the idea would not only work, but would be beneficial for the Trust and the land entrusted to them to steward. While many staff and board members strongly supported establishing a farm that could be representative of how regenerative agriculture could work in concert with the surrounding ecosystem, some had reservations about the Trust's capacity to manage this new project.

Fellow staff member Lisa Kiziuk had supported establishing a farm on conserved land but had some reservations about the impact on the resident and migratory bird population.

"I have a clear memory early on in the development of Rushton Farm about discussing with Lisa whether or not agricultural land would negatively impact the bird population," recalls de Long.

A $102k grant from the state in 2007 to break ground plus a smaller grant from the Delaware Valley Ornithological Club to start a bird banding station to study the effect of farming on migrating birds made the proposed project an easier sell.

Once the farm was up and running, de Long and the rest of the Trust were delighted to see that the organic and regenerative farming practices they use supports a diverse bird population.

"Diversity is the most important thing," says de Long. "We grow 140 varieties of fruits and vegetables on the farm and we ensure that there are plenty of native plants around our field borders to provide extra habitat and food supply," says de Long.

The farm's thriving CSA program now has an approximately 10 year waiting list to join.

"It's all about agro-ecology, how agriculture and the ecosystem work together," he adds.

As a result of the work happening on Rushton Farm, Willistown Conservation Trust is now nationally recognized as a strong example of the benefits of work in the study of agroecology (farming with nature in mind).

Rushton Farm not only helps support bird populations and important native pollinators, but it has drawn new human visitors, too.

"It gives us an opportunity to engage people—over the food we grow, as a place to talk to farmers about what we are doing on the land, as a quiet place to watch birds and even as a community meeting place," says de Long.

The property has also become a living laboratory for students of all ages through the Trust's "Rushton 360" and "Food and Feathers" programs. Student groups and land trust staff and board members are encouraged to visit the farm, see bird banding in action and eat lunch made from produce grown on the property in their daylong workshops.

Several rounds of University of Pennsylvania graduate students have spent time on the farm studying the number of native bees and cataloging plant life for their capstone projects. Kiziuk, with assistance from de Long, teach university courses in environmental science based on their Rushton Farm experiences.

"People who have worked with or visited Rushton become our ambassadors for the environment wherever they go," says de Long. "It has become so much bigger than just Rushton Farm."

Rushton Farm is part of the Rushton Woods Preserve and Farm located at 911 Delchester Rd., Newtown Square. It is open 7 days a week for visitors to visit the farm and surrounding nature preserve, www.wctrust.org.

A man wearing a grey t-shirt, khaki pants, and a baseball cap stands in a field of young green plants. The field is covered with straw mulch. In the background, there is a green pickup truck, a large metal silo, and a line of trees under a hazy sky.

Farmers Markets

Farmers markets are often open-air venues at which farmers and producers offer their products. For the purpose of this guide, farmers markets are generally “producer only markets,” meaning they sell what they produce, not items they purchase from other suppliers.

❄ Markets denoted with a snowflake host winter markets at least once a month during the off-season.

f Listings with the Facebook logo have a Facebook page at the time of publication.

SNAP: Markets with this designation accept Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) benefits as payment for food purchases. Visit www.benefits.gov for more information.

If you are a Chester County farmer or you sell farm products grown in the county, contact the Ag Council at 610-344-6285 or alane@chesco.org to be added to the guide.

CSA Community Supported Agriculture

Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) is a partnership between the farmer and the members of that CSA. Members pay upfront for the products they will receive during the growing season. This upfront investment helps the farmer have capital for seeds and supplies and helps the farmer plan how much produce to grow. The farmer and the members share in the bounty and/or risk of the harvest.

Pick-Your-Own Fun on the Farm

Not everyone is cut out to be a farmer, but it's hard to beat a fall afternoon spent in an apple orchard with your family. Chester County farmers are opening their doors—and their fields—throughout the growing season for family-friendly pick-your-own experiences. Try your hand at harvesting everything from strawberries in the spring to pumpkins in the fall.

You can also find corn mazes, flower arranging workshops, friendly farm animals, hayrides and a host of other fun activities. For cut-your-own Christmas tree farms, see page 25.

Here are some of the farms who will be welcoming visitors this season:

The Duncan Allison Distinguished Service to Agriculture Award

In a typical year, the Chester County Commissioners and Ag Council present the Duncan Allison Award for Distinguished Service to Agriculture to a deserving individual who has positively promoted, made significant contributions to, or provided exceptional services for the county's farming community.

Since 2020 was anything but typical, the Commissioners and Ag Council have chosen to recognize the entire Chester County agriculture community for their many acts of service and food donations to residents in need during the pandemic.

Examples of this generosity abound including the Chester-Delaware Farm Bureau's milk giveaways, the Chester County Food Bank's longstanding gleaning programs in partnership with area farms and the mushroom industry which donated thousands of pounds of fresh mushrooms to food banks for distribution.

"We usually think of agriculture as Chester County's top industry for economic reasons but its generosity of spirit, especially during tough times, is what makes agriculture the heart of our communities," says Chester County Ag Council Board Chair Chris Alonzo.

For more information about the Chester County Ag Council and our awards program, visit www.chescofarming.org.
